CAMBRIDGE — From April 8 to July 6, 2003, the MIT List Visual Arts Center presents a film by Jun Nguyen-Hatsushiba: Memorial Project Nha Trang, Vietnam Towards the Complex – For the Courageous, the Curious and the Cowards (2001). This 13-minute film, screened as a DVD video projection was originally commissioned for the 2001 Yokohama Triennale of Contemporary Art, Japan.

Filmed on location in Vietnam’s IndoChina Sea, Jun Nguyen-Hatsushiba’s film focuses on the lives of Vietnamese cyclo drivers. Cyclos, human-powered rickshaws, are an inexpensive means of transportation used to transport goods and people in Vietnam. The cyclo industry is a source of income for many Vietnamese who were left unemployed as a result of the country’s reunification. Modernization, however, has made these vehicles unwelcome on city streets in Vietnam because, although cyclos have less negative impact on the environment, they are slow moving and old-fashioned. As a result, the government has banned further production of cyclos.

This remarkable film depicts a number of young men struggling to propel cyclos across the rock-strewn and sandy ocean floor. Working in teams, they pull, push, and pedal the passenger-less vehicles. Periodically, and in ever-shortening cycles, they rush up to the surface for air or risk drowning. The water grows deeper; the boulders get larger; the trip to the surface takes longer; and the task is increasingly arduous. Finally, the drivers abandon their cyclos, and swim together toward an underwater "city" composed of tents made from white netting strung between boulders— a metaphor, perhaps, for the many Vietnamese boat people who drowned in the aftermath of the war. The clear blue water, sunlight dappling the ocean floor, and gentle flute music composed by Quoc Bao and Nguyen-Hatsushiba, again provide stark contrast in this all-too-real metaphor for this endangered way of life.
Jun Nguyen-Hatsushiba was born in Japan in 1968. He now lives and works in Vietnam. He was educated in the United States at Brookhaven College, Dallas, TX; The School of the Art Institute of Chicago, IL; and the Maryland Institute, College of Art, Mount Royal School of Art, Baltimore, MD.

This presentation is part of the Boston Cyberarts Festival, 2003.
